saké facts

- saké is a 6,800 year old beverage originating in China
- koji is an enzyme that converts the starch in the rice into sugar to facilitate fermentation
- quality of the spring water is extremely important. semi-hard water is most suitable for saké brewing due to its lower iron and manganese content.
- unlike wine, saké has no sulfites and comparatively free of hangover-causing congeners and preservatives
- saké has one-third the acidity of wine, so it is easy on the stomach

nigori

Nigori is the way saké first appeared when it was brewed for the imperial court in Kyoto over 1,200 years ago. The “cloudy” or milky, opaque appearance is created by coarsely-filtering the rice during the production process. Nigori is the sweetest of all our types of sake.

junmai

Junmai means “pure saké” made only from rice, milled at least to 70% of the original size, water, and koji. Junmai tends to have a mellow bouquet and a rich, smooth flavor.

ginjo

Ginjo uses no more than 60% of the original rice grain. This is the second highest grade of saké with the defining characteristics of smoothness, depth of flavors, and complexity.

dai ginjo

The pride of Japan, dai ginjo is the ultra-premium standard. Handmade, free-run, small batch saké is made of rice milled to at least 50% of the original size.
