★★★ SLIPPERY NOODLE TRIVIA ★★★

The "Slippery Noodle Inn" was named by Hal's dad in 1963 after a lengthy family debate (Hal was six years old). Names were thrown out for the family to vote on and at about 5 a.m. "Slippery Noodle Inn" sounded pretty darn good. The Noodle has remained in the Yeagy family since.

The "inn" had been used in all types of activities. It was originally built as a road house and bar for railroad passengers. In the Civil War years it was a way station for the Underground Railroad. Later years saw a bordello open in the once luxurious Inn. It remained open until 1953 when a patron was murdered. Two customers of the bordello got into an argument over one of the women, one killing the other and leaving a bloody knife on the bar. During prohibition whiskey was made in the basement and the gangsters (Dillinger and Brady gangs) used the building in back for target practice. Several of the slugs remain embedded in the lower east wall. That building was originally built as a horse stable for patrons of the inn. In addition to beer and liquor being distilled in the basement, cattle and swine were also slaughtered and butchered there. The meat hooks and water lines are still present.

The ceiling in the front is made from pressed tin. It was installed circa 1890. The "Tiger Oak" bar and back bar are over a 100 years old and believed to be original. The trough in the front bar was used as the cash register in the olden days. The "honor" system worked or else the Colt 45 did. The Noodle is the oldest commercial building left standing in Indianapolis and the Tremont House sign painted on the north side of the building dates back to the 1850's.
